

In Volume 5 of this ground-breaking series, the author moves from diagnosis to direct intervention. What if a child were raised almost entirely within the linguistic and cultural atmosphere of pristine English—shielded as far as possible from the feudal codes of Indian languages and the surrounding society?

This volume is the documented record of that deliberate experiment: a first-person account of shielding an infant mind from the graded hierarchies, contempt vectors, and degrading indicant words that the author has spent decades arguing are the invisible software of social and psychological subjugation in the Indian subcontinent.

From English rhymes at three months, swimming in streams at eight months and later in the sea, wall-walking and breakfalls before age three, long-distance two-wheeler journeys for sensory input, hundreds of English films and comics by age three, chess and card games in refined English, casual mathematics and computer mastery before five, to web design and eCommerce integration by seven—the narrative details the methods, the protective barriers, the observed radiance, the early intellectual and physical outcomes, and the inevitable social frictions that arose when feudal codes pressed in from every side.

More than a memoir or parenting guide, this is an anthropological and linguistic experiment carried out in real time, under real constraints, with real human consequences.

It asks: Can the liberating, planar neutrality of English dissolve centuries of encoded degradation when applied consistently from birth? What personality, intellect, and bearing emerge when a mind grows free of triadic respect/contempt hierarchies? And what might this small-scale attempt imply for the possibility of wider social transformation in a region still dominated by the very codes it seeks to supersede?

The results speak for themselves. The implications are profound.
